CHAIR'S REPORT

This has been an extraordinary year in education. Across the world over a billion learners have faced disruption to their education as the pandemic has forced schools to close and lessons, where possible, have been provided remotely, supported by whatever technology has – or has not – been available. Education policymakers, teachers, pupils, and parents have faced challenges on a scale never seen before.

Throughout this time, we have focused our world-leading research to lead thinking on how best to continue – and restart – education through the crisis. Around the world, our researchers and consultants have fed into leading global institutions, such as the newly created EdTech Hub research partnership, to build up the global knowledge base on remote pedagogy and education in emergencies. And even as our research has shown the importance of leading with an adaptive mindset, of sustaining teacher presence and high-quality teaching in student's lives, and of the vital role school leaders have in galvanizing community support for remote learning initiatives, so we have ourselves implemented these principles into practice in our own programmers and schools around the world.

In a year that has seen inequalities so vividly exposed, our programs and interventions are the most powerful tool that we have to positively impact the lives of those in disadvantaged groups. Internally too, we have increased our focus on inclusion and diversity in all that we do. We have established a new global taskforce

As the world emerges from the pandemic and looks to the still wider challenges of this century, education will be more important than ever. At Navsanjeevan Social Trust, we will continue to champion our mission – improving education to transform lives around the world.
